What happens when a small non-profit with a big mission needs to amplify its voice? I stepped in as the communication bridge, content creator, and strategist. Over one term, I managed two Facebook accounts, one Instagram account, and engaged with hundreds of community groups—all to help Unique Get-Together Society (UGTS) expand their reach and empower marginalized communities. Here is my experience and what I learned along the way.

About UGTS

Unique Get-Together Society (UGTS) is a non-profit organization dedicated to supporting Indigenous and marginalized communities in British Columbia. Be part of the movement to empower marginalized communities —this is the vision that guided my work as a social media volunteer, helping UGTS amplify their voice and expand their reach to those who need them most.

My Role

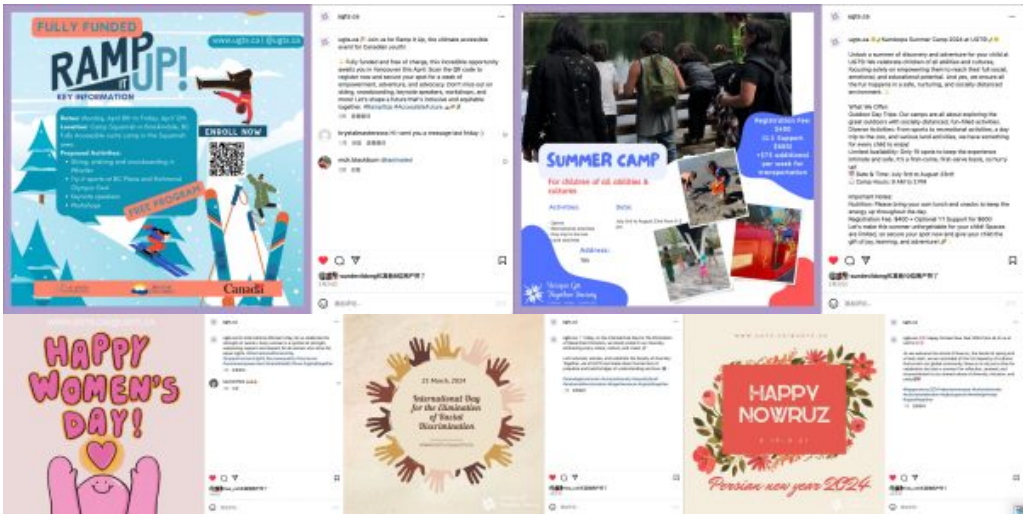

As a Marketing Team Member at UGTS, I served as the primary communication bridge between the organization and the volunteer team, ensuring strategic alignment and information accuracy. I managed two Facebook accounts and one Instagram account, created engaging content, and used data analytics to optimize performance. Through active engagement in hundreds of community groups, I helped expand UGTS's online presence to support their mission of empowering marginalized communities.

Strategic Communication & Client Partnership

As the spokesperson and primary communication bridge between the student volunteer team and UGTS, I ensured all information exchanged was accurate, aligned with the organization's needs, and acted as the single point of contact for all client communications. I identified the organization's critical pain points—lack of a social media strategy, limited staff capacity, and the need to maximize impact with minimal resources. I verified and approved all content with the client before publication, preventing miscommunication and building trust. I took the initiative to re-engage key contacts and clarify expectations when facing communication delays, keeping the project on track.

Creative Development & Content Strategy

To help UGTS connect with their target audience, I worked collaboratively with my team to align our efforts and maintain consistency across all platforms. I took ownership of all visual and written content across their social media platforms. We designed eye-catching posters and graphics to ensure a consistent, professional brand image. We crafted persuasive, platform-specific copy—informative for Facebook, engaging for Instagram—to convert followers into active supporters. We also ensured all content was culturally sensitive and accurately reflected UGTS's work serving Indigenous and marginalized communities.

Data Analysis & Growth Management

My role extended beyond content creation to the hands-on management and strategic growth of UGTS's social media presence: I was directly responsible for the day-to-day operations of two distinct Facebook accounts (the main UGTS page and the Kamloops-specific page) and one Instagram account, requiring a nuanced understanding of each account's unique audience.

I tailored posts to their respective audiences—main page content focused on broader organizational impact, while the Kamloops page featured localized events and community-specific stories.To expand the organization's reach, I actively responded to comments on both platforms and strategically posted event information in hundreds of Facebook community groups, directly inserting UGTS into local conversations and exponentially increasing visibility.I utilized backend analytics to track reach, engagement, and click-through rates, using these insights to refine posting times, hashtags, and content formats for maximum impact.

Throughout the one term I worked at UGTS as a Marketing Team Member, I was exposed to several situations that allowed me to demonstrate some of my already acquired skills and to strengthen others. During my time there, I worked on social media management and team collaboration, and I was put in different situations that gave me the opportunity to make mistakes, learn from them, and improve my work skills. I am really grateful for this opportunity to work with different people and in a nonprofit setting. The following table shows some of the skills I developed as a Marketing Team Member. (If the content of the table is difficult to read, there will also be a typed version under each table.)

I was responsible for creating a promotional poster for an upcoming summer camp event. When I showed the first draft to the project lead, she pointed out that the photos I selected lacked diversity and should include people of various skin tones and ethnicities.	I needed to quickly revise the poster to meet the lead's diversity requirements and ensure the event promotion accurately reflected the organization's inclusive values.	After receiving the feedback, I immediately replied to the project lead in the work group chat, first acknowledging that I had not thought it through carefully enough. Then I asked my colleague who was managing the event if there were any photos from past events. After receiving the photos, I quickly selected images that represented a variety of skin tones and ethnicities, replaced them in the poster, and adjusted the layout accordingly.	The project lead was satisfied with the revised poster, and it was published on time for summer camp promotion.	When receiving feedback, it is important to acknowledge shortcomings immediately and take action quickly rather than making excuses or delaying. This ability to respond quickly and solve problems will help me work efficiently and professionally in any role that requires collaboration and responding to stakeholder feedback.

Skill: Problem Solving

Situation:

As a member of the social media team, we took over the Instagram and Facebook accounts for UGTS, a Vancouver-based nonprofit supporting marginalized communities. I was responsible for creating a promotional poster for an upcoming summer camp event. When I showed the first draft to the project lead, she pointed out that the photos I selected lacked diversity and should include people of various skin tones and ethnicities.

Task:

I needed to quickly revise the poster to meet the lead's diversity requirements and ensure the event promotion accurately reflected the organization's inclusive values.

Action:

After receiving the feedback, I immediately replied to the project lead in the work group chat, first acknowledging that I had not thought it through carefully enough. Then I asked my colleague who was managing the event if there were any photos from past events. After receiving the photos, I quickly selected images that represented a variety of skin tones and ethnicities, replaced them in the poster, and adjusted the layout accordingly.

Result:

The project lead was satisfied with the revised poster, and it was published on time for summer camp promotion.

Relevance:

When receiving feedback, it is important to acknowledge shortcomings immediately and take action quickly rather than making excuses or delaying. This ability to respond quickly and solve problems will help me work efficiently and professionally in any role that requires collaboration and responding to stakeholder feedback.

Conclusion

While I am still exploring where my career path will lead, this experience at UGTS has given me clarity about what I want to pursue. I have discovered a passion for strategic communication, community engagement. I enjoy being the communication bridge between an organization and its audience—translating needs into action, and messages into impact. This role also reinforced my commitment to continuous growth. Every poster I designed, every comment I responded to, and every challenge I worked through taught me something valuable. I am grateful for the trust UGTS placed in me and for the hands-on experience that sharpened both my technical skills and my empathy.

Moving forward, I hope to bring these skills to organizations that need them most—whether locally or in other communities where resources for marginalized groups are scarce. I leave this experience more confident, more capable, and more certain of the work I want to continue doing. Be part of the movement to empower marginalized communities.
