Final Project - The Ride

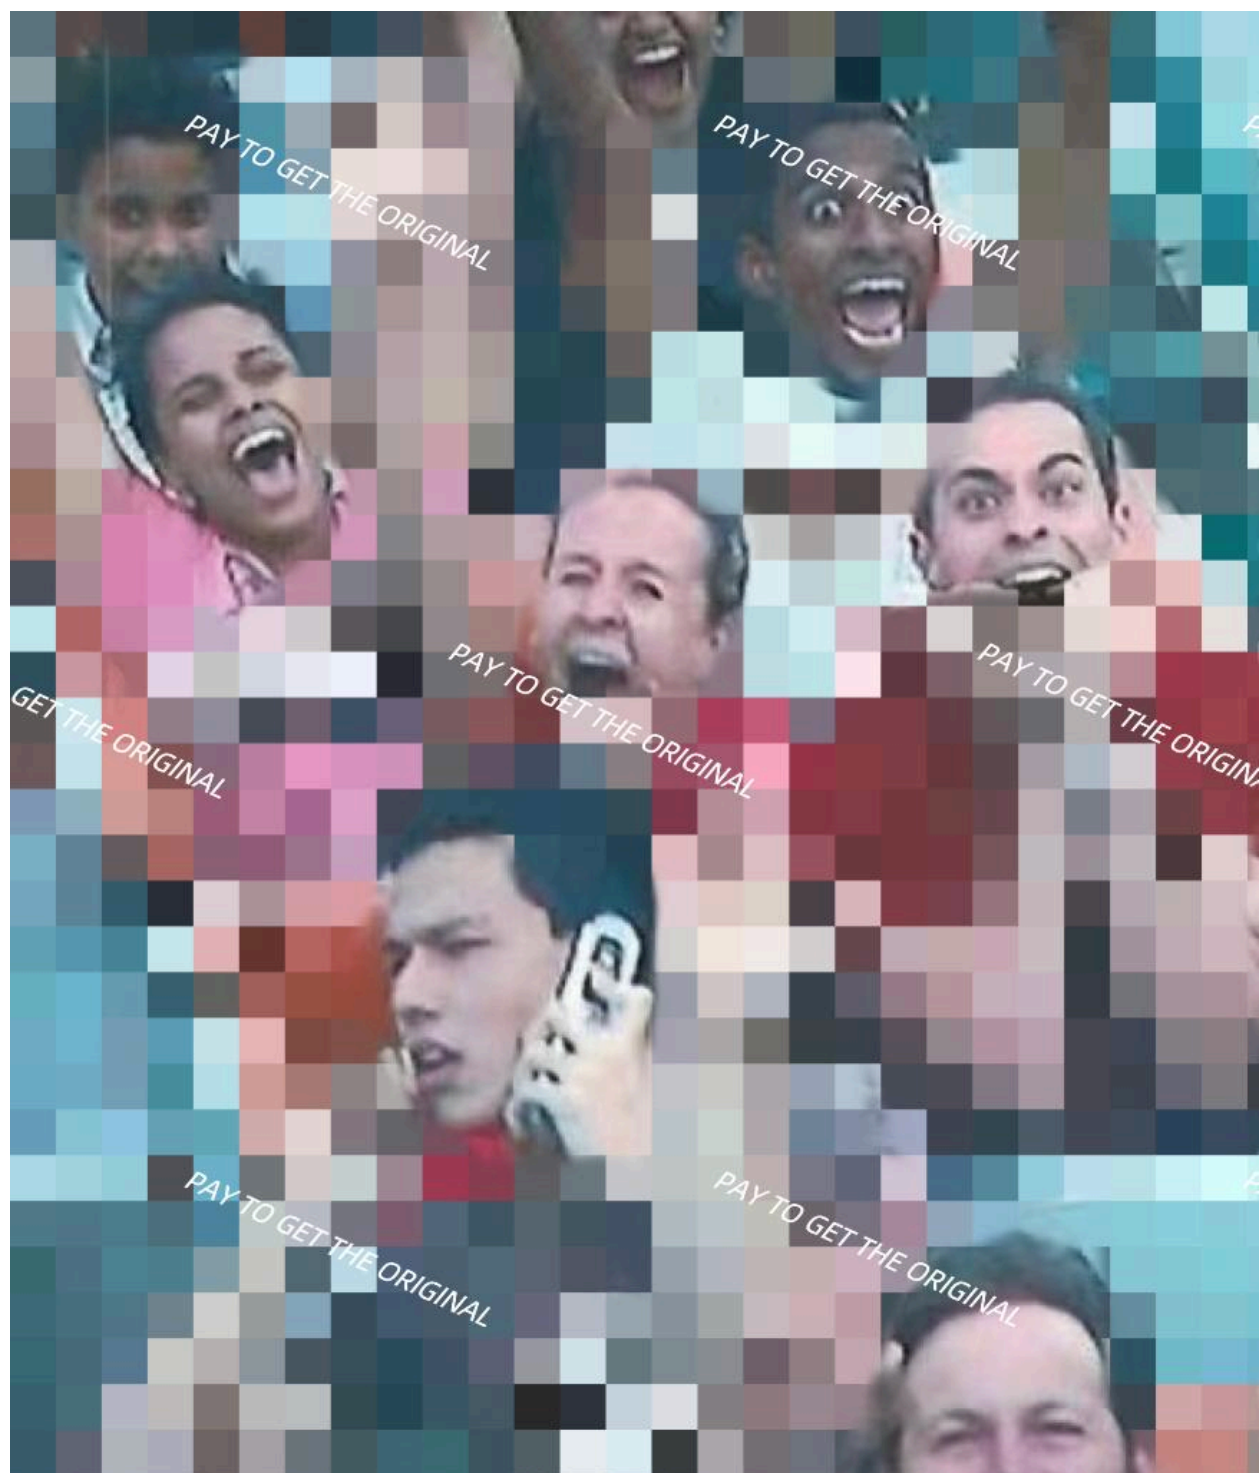

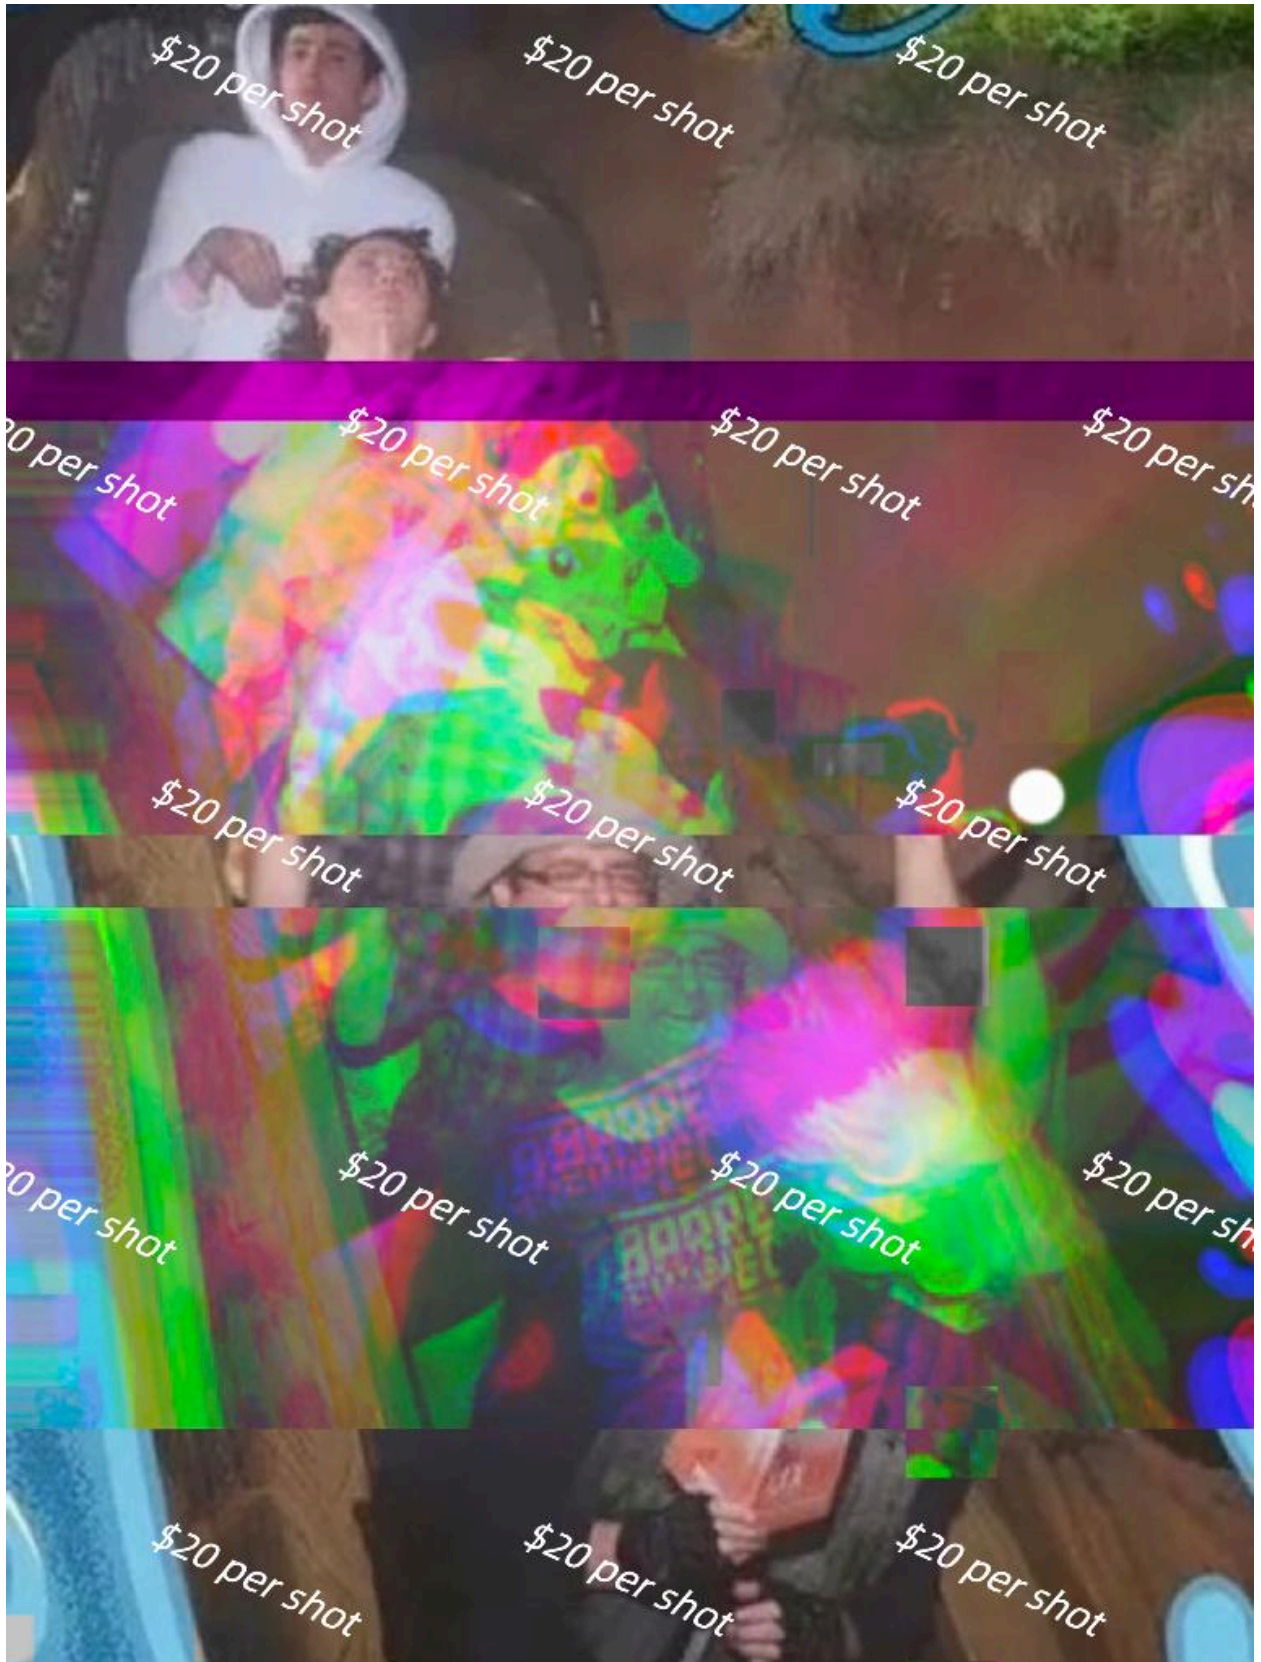

Artist Statement

My work explores glitch art through the lens of roller coaster snapshots, focusing on the fleeting, extreme moments of emotion and motion that are captured during the ride. These images reveal the raw, often absurd expressions of riders as they experience the intense physical highs and lows, sharp turns, and freefalls. In my view, these roller coaster photos serve as a form of "temptation service" following an emotional explosion. When riders' emotions are fully "released" and displayed, the ownership of these expressions shifts from the riders to the amusement park. At this moment, their private emotions are commodified and transformed into something consumable through the medium of photography.

To regain control over this image, riders must pay for the photo, which creates a cycle of emotional display and purchase. This process mirrors how we share emotions on social media, where, although voluntary, the underlying control is often beyond our reach. In this way, my work examines the stripping and reconstitution of identity: emotions and expressions are no longer fully personal, but become "emotion symbols" held and priced by the park. Through techniques like mosaic, watermark text, and silkscreen, I address how the display and repurchase of emotions is both a form of consumption and a means of emotional redistribution and regulation.
